

Tyler Rolfe

1) Mindset

My mindset score was 25, and I believe that's pretty accurate toward what I think. In most cases, I believe that people don't change on a fundamental level. However, I do still believe that many impactful changes can be made. Overall I don't know if this is correct I just personally haven't seen anyone change drastically. After thinking about it now, I would say I am more open to the idea that someone could fully change if they truly wanted to.

2) Culture

I can't imagine any way that culture doesn't directly impact learning and education. Every culture has its idea on the importance of learning, and these views can influence someone greatly. To me, culture ranges from large religions to small groups formed online. In my experience, I was influenced by two contradicting ideas about learning. My family has always imposed great importance on learning and especially higher education, while most of the people around me held very little regard for any of it. People in the town that I lived in seemed to barely value school, and the school itself often values sports more. In the end, I made up my mind based on both beliefs.

3) Learning Styles

I am a visual learner, and after learning this a while ago, I have been able to improve the way I learn drastically. I wouldn't say that I can only learn visually, however it is by far the best way for me to retain information. I think it is important for people to know the best learning style for them but it's also important to try new things because it's hard to say what will work best for someone before they try it.